The question is not, is it possible to educate all children well? But rather, do we want to do it badly enough?... There's a radical- and wonderful – new idea here: the idea that every citizen is capable of the kind of intellectual competence previously attained by only a small minority... Children should be inventors of their own theories, critics of other peoples' ideas, analyzers of evidence, and makers of their own personal marks on this most complex world. Meier's work (as cited in Schmoker, 2006, p. 55).
